

Church Expanding Online Offerings in Languages

LDS.org is expanding its language offerings. Recently 48 new language index pages were added to the Church's official website. By clicking on any language under the "Languages" link in the upper right corner on any page of LDS.org, visitors can see links to Church material currently available online in that language.

Different sections of LDS.org will eventually be available in 10 to 15 languages. At that point, the language page for those languages will be retired. (For example, there is no language page for English, French, German, Italian, Portuguese, or Spanish, because those languages already have much of LDS.org in their language.)

Church employees are also working to make magazines and other translated material from LDS.org available for mobile devices. ■

Church Hopes to Build Temple in France

President Thomas S. Monson announced in July 2011 that the Church hopes to build its first temple in France on property on the outskirts of Paris.

The Church has been working for many months with local officials.

There have been several previous attempts to find a suitable site for a French temple, but none were finalized. French members of the Church wishing to visit a temple usually travel to neighboring European countries.

New Format for Audio Scriptures Increases Accessibility

The Church has released an audio version of the LDS standard works for download on iTunes in audiobook (called "enhanced audio content" on iTunes) or MP3 format.

The audio version of the full standard works is available in English and Spanish, and the audio versions of the Japanese, Portuguese, and Korean triple combinations are also available.

To access these new resources, go to the scriptures section of the Church's channel at iTunes.Lds.org. ■

Audio versions of the standard works are now available in several languages at iTunes.Lds.org.
