

The Facebook Project

A simple plan
on social media had a big impact.

By Mandalyn Ferguson

As I looked at my list of Facebook friends one day, I decided to try something new. I'd been thinking about individual worth. I'd gained a testimony that we are all sons and daughters of God and are dearly loved. We all have talents and the right and responsibility to use them. When I looked at my peers and neighbors, I wanted to remind them of their unique worth.

And thus the Facebook Project began.

I decided that every day I would send messages to five people on my friends list and tell them what I like about them. It was a simple goal. I was expecting to merely write a simple sentence or two to each person. And I wasn't expecting anything more than a simple thank-you in return.

But as I prayed about it to Heavenly Father each morning, I felt inspiration—and my messages became at least a paragraph for each person. Each person is unique and important, so it wasn't difficult to find people's talents and gifts, especially with God's help.

I was overwhelmed by people's responses! I cannot count how many people said, "That made my day!" Some people said that my message helped them through a trial or changed their perspective. Some of the people I had been most nervous about sending a message to were the most grateful for it. It made me realize that a lot of people struggle with recognizing their self-worth or with feeling hopeful in the deteriorating conditions of today's world, and a kind, specific comment can mean a lot to them.

I've learned a lot from this project. For one thing, people are a lot different from what they may seem to be on the outside. They all have trials and need help. I've also learned how readily God will help you when you want to help others. If you have a righteous goal, then He will assist you.

Helping others recognize their self-worth has helped me recognize my own. I know that my experience with this has helped me and a lot of other people too, and I am forever grateful to Heavenly Father. NE
